Environment) and various ministers started taking charge of the matter when they saw the interest that the international organizations such as the International Council of Birds Preservation (ICBP) had shown. This organization sent Christopher Imboden, its president at the time, and Lester Short and other well known personalities to Havana. Another retired general commander received them there. This was Francisco Pérez, who gave them the keys to the city and organized an airport tour to Ojito de Agua with Mayra as a host.

The promises by the ACC, of doing everything possible to protect the Ojito de Agua area, the promises in the forest section of the MINAGRI because of the manner in which the wood was affected, and the tremendous attention that the security agencies of the local communist structure gave to all scientific or cultural projects that involved the attention of Cuban and foreign professionals (even so if they were American), demonstrated the important change in the research related to the Ivory-billed Woodpecker and the Ojito de Agua region.
